1. What are we aiming to accomplish?
Improve access to affordable, high-quality health care that helps break the cycle of environmental destruction and disease by providing alternative, sustainable livelihoods that contribute to improving global health. Understand and replicate the success we have had at our first program site at additional sites around the world.

2. What are our strategies for making this happen?
Develop robust research program to track metrics and understand our theory of change. Research and approach potential partners in replication and begin site visits to assess the potential for collaboration.

3. What are our organization's capabilities for doing this?
We recently created positions for both research and replication and also increased staff capacity to recruit and manage high quality volunteers and effectively fundraise from foundations and individuals.

4. How will we know if we're making progress?
Number of lives saved, reductions in rates of deforestation, increase in local incomes, improvement in school completion rates. We are still developing indicators of success for new program sites, but we do have goals for number of site evaluations and visits we plan to accomplish and specific research and fundraising targets we plan to meet.

5. What have and haven't we accomplished so far?
5-year Community Impact Survey showed a 68% percent decline in logging in our area, while it increased in the rest of Indonesia. You can see the entire results from the survey at http://www.healthinharmony.org/media/2013/01/ASRI-Five-Year-Survey-Results-Complete.pdf. We continue to support our initial program partner ASRI while also growing our staff, fundraising and communication metrics, and quality of volunteer program. In 2014, we successfully completed fundraising for a Community Hospital and Training Center at ASRI. This building will put ASRI on the path to being self-sustaining, and allowing Health In Harmony both the resources and the laboratory to test and train for new sites.
