Wander Through The New Sculpture Forest In Washington With A Detailed Self-Guided Tour

For many of us, the events of the past year have led to us spending more time outdoors. And since outdoor hangouts are still preferable, we’re thrilled to report that Washington’s new sculpture forest is now open to the public. This gorgeous space is a modern art gallery inside a lush green forest, a convergence of nature and man-made beauty. Check out the Price Sculpture Forest.

We’re aware that these uncertain times are limiting many aspects of life. While we continue to feature destinations that make our state wonderful, please take proper precautions or add them to your bucket list to see at a later date. If you know of a local business that could use some extra support during these times, please nominate them here: onlyinyourstate.com/nominate You’ll find Price Sculpture Forest just east of downtown Coupeville on central Whidbey Island.

There's never a bad time to visit Whidbey, and late winter happens to be a nice, quiet time to go.

Founder Scott Price originally purchased this land to build a home.
the views. So he decided to do something more meaningful.

Price placed a conservation easement on the land, which means it's protected land... forever.
He was inspired to create a sculpture garden here after visiting several himself. And so, Washington's sculpture forest was born.

Stroll through the forest and you'll see art hanging from trees, hidden behind foliage, or showcased on the ground in all its glory.
Not only are the sculptures fantastic, but you'll also love exploring the century-old trees, rhododendrons, and lush green land.

The location for these unique sculptures really couldn't be more perfect.

Here's the best part: Price Sculpture Forest is open every day from dawn to dusk, and it's free to visit.
This enchanting experience is just a short ferry ride away.

Coupeville’s 1.5-mile walking path extends directly from the downtown area to the sculpture forest, so it’s easy to find.